"The function of education— the human goal, the humanistic goal, the goal so far as human beings are concerned— is ultimately the 'self-actualization' of a person, the 'becoming fully human,' the development of the fullest height that the human species can stand up to, or that the particular individual can come to. In a less technical way, it is helping the person to become the best he is able to become." -Maslow

The following is a quote from physicist Albert Einstein (1879-1955):

- a. In your own words, what is he saying?
- b. How would you rate how long you can stick with a difficult problem in math on your own? Circle:
- (I give up immediately) 1      2      3      4      5 (I never give up)
- c. What is 1 specific thing you can do to push yourself to continue trying something difficult in math, or other classes?

Fun fact: Not everything Einstein did was successful!

However, for much of the later part of his career, he worked on two ultimately unsuccessful endeavors. First, despite his great contributions to quantum mechanics, he opposed what it evolved into, objecting that nature "does not play dice".<sup>[17]</sup> Second, he attempted to devise a unified field theory by generalizing his geometric theory of gravitation to include electromagnetism. As a result, he became increasingly isolated from the mainstream of modern physics.

A Study in Minorities and Math

Model Overview:

In the late 1970's and early 1980's, graduate student Uri Treisman at the University of California, Berkeley, was working on the problem of high failure rates of minority students in undergraduate calculus courses. According to Treisman (1985), the African-American calculus students at Berkeley "were valedictorians and leaders of church youth groups, individuals who were the pride of their communities. ... Thus, these students had come to Berkeley highly motivated and under great pressure to succeed" (p. 21). Nevertheless, folklore blamed the high failure rates on the students' lack of motivation, lack of educational background, and lack of family emphasis on education (Treisman, 1992). Treisman's work (Treisman, 1985) challenged these hypotheses, and replaced the remedial approaches with an honors program that encouraged students to collaborate on challenging problems in an environment of high expectations (Conciatore, 1990). . . .

Collaborative learning:

In his initial investigation, Treisman "was struck by the sharp separation that most black students maintained—regardless of class or educational background—between their school lives and their social lives" (Treisman, 1985, p. 12). He went on to compare these students with their Asian counterparts—who had a history of being very successful in the calculus courses—noting that most of the black students studied alone while the Asian students sought peers with whom to collaborate. More than merely studying together, the Asian students formed academic communities:

Composed of students with shared purpose, the informal study groups of Chinese freshmen enabled their members not only to share mathematical knowledge but also to "check out" their understanding of what was being required of them by their professors and, more generally, by the University. ...

[Treisman] observed Chinese students in their study groups ask each other questions ranging from whether one was permitted to write in pencil on a test to how one might circumvent certain University financial aid regulations. More important was the fact that these students routinely critiqued each other's work, assisted each other with homework problems, and shared all manner of information related to their common interests. Their collaboration provided them with valuable information that guided their day-to-day study. (Treisman, 1985, pp. 13-14)

Since “interactions like these were extremely rare among the blacks” (Treisman, 1985, p. 16), the key then was to build a community based in the study of mathematics, to create a merging rather than a separation of academic and social lives.

Treisman's mathematics workshop recruited mostly African-American and Latino students having relatively high SAT Mathematics scores or intending to major in a mathematics-based field or both. Key elements of the workshop involved:

- the focus on helping minority students to excel at the University, rather than merely to avoid failure;
- the emphasis on collaborative learning and the use of small-group teaching methods; and
- the faculty sponsorship, which has both nourished the program and enabled it to survive. (Treisman, 1985, pp. 30-31)

The resulting model replaces regular calculus discussion sections with workshop-style discussion sections, in which the students collaborate on non-textbook, non-routine problems. During these work sessions (which meet for larger blocks of time than traditional classes), “[students] begin working the problems individually, then, when things get tough, in collaboration with one another. These experiences lead to a strong sense of community and the forging of lasting friendships” (Gillman, 1990, p. 8).

The Berkeley program has been so successful that it has spread to other universities and colleges throughout the country. Modified versions have entered high schools, in forms designed to fit the particular environment and needs. As Treisman has stressed, the program is not remedial—nor should it be—and care is taken with replications that they do not revert to remedial programs. . . .

Early life and education   [\[ edit \]](#)

Trujillo was born in 1983, in Cali, Colombia.<sup>[1][6]</sup> Her mother was a medical student when she got pregnant and had to leave her studies to look after her daughter.<sup>[7]</sup> Trujillo attended 'Colegio Internacional Cañaverales',<sup>[8]</sup> a bilingual school accredited by the International Baccalaureate, formerly the International Baccalaureate Organization (IBO).<sup>[9]</sup> From her school years, she had interest in science and questioned the roles that are traditionally associated with women.<sup>[6]</sup>

Uncertain but determined to overcome the economic difficulties that her family faced in Colombia, she moved to the United States at the age of seventeen with only $300.<sup>[10]</sup> In order to improve her language skills, she started English lessons at the Miami Dade College while working as a housekeeper, among other jobs.<sup>[11]</sup>

Trujillo enrolled initially at the University of Florida to pursue studies in Aerospace Engineering,<sup>[7]</sup> inspired by a magazine article about the role of women working on aerospace missions and having self-confidence in her strong Mathematical skills. While studying at the university, she decided to apply for the NASA Academy, being the first Hispanic immigrant woman admitted to the program.<sup>[7]</sup> She was one of the two participants to get a job offer from NASA.<sup>[7]</sup> During her work at the Academy, she met NASA robots
